A hallmark of the baccalaureate-prepared nurse is leadership. The nurse must have the knowledge, skills, and subsequent confidence to adequately delegate tasks and to supervise and lead in an effective and professional manner. She must be able to perform well in group tasks, an important part of the interdisciplinary aspect of health care in today's world. She must be aware of advocacy issues, ethical and legal issues, and able to handle them in a professional manner for the welfare of the patient, as well as society.

Technology has changed the way that health care functions, as it has the rest of the world. The nursing professional must have in-depth knowledge of today's health technology methods, in the area of electronic records, and the various technical tools that are available for patient care, such as assessment data, telemedicine, telemonitoring and telehealth. Nurses must be aware of privacy issues these changes have and will cause. I am impressed with Empire State's curriculum because it includes such themes.

The current and rapid changes in health care technology and therapies mean lowered acute care stays in hospitals. Sophisticated surgical technologies are much less invasive than years ago and promote quicker healing and less time in the hospital setting. Reduced mortality rates for diseases such as AIDS and cancer is also significant in that these diseases, once considered fatal are now chronic illnesses, which require ongoing nursing assessment and care. The lowered acute care stays as described above mean many more people requiring care in their own communities. Nurses need to be better prepared to work within this area. My ASN degree did not prepare me for work in this important area, and I am very excited that Empire State's nursing program places great emphasis on Community Health Nursing course. I also look forward to Advanced Clinical Experience, which emphasizes developing "the multidimensional competencies essential to become an effective nurse leader", which is an important goal of mine. A nurse's decisions should be evidence based, that is based on the most current research and theories. I look forward to the Nursing Research course offered in Empire State's nursing curriculum.

A benefit of the baccalaureate trained nurse is the liberal education that one receives.
